1. What about mixing men and women - Paul Hollis having done deliverance ministry for a number of years generally prefers to have one man ministering deliverance to one man, and one woman ministering deliverance to one woman. However...
  - a. When a deliverance minister is just getting started, a second deliverance minister is a good idea to have as an intercessor
  - b. It is also a good idea to have a second deliverance minister for safety and protection against an evil spirit that may try to manifest in a violent way
  - c. The problem with a man ministering to a woman is that the evil spirit in the woman may have the woman start ripping her own clothes off and then falsely accuse the man of trying to rape her or inappropriately touch her (Gen 39:11-18). Never be in a situation where you can be accused or falsely accused of impropriety. To avoid accusations of impropriety, a psychologist/therapist/deliverance minister might establish an office in which other (men and women) therapists/ministers are around, and the therapist/minister leaves the door to his office open when ministering to someone of the opposite sex.
  - d. Therefore, Paul does minister to women one on one all by himself, but Paul makes certain there is another eye witness nearby or in the room who can testify about what was going on. He was recently ministering one on one to a woman and felt impressed to ask his wife to come over. Paul had his wife lay hands on the woman's abdomen to renounce a spirit of barrenness (so no problem using a husband/wife team to minister to someone). Paul says that he holds the woman's hands but does not lay hands on any other body parts.
2. How much detail needs to be divulged – For example, let's say a person has been abused. It is up to the person who wants to be delivered to decide how much detail they want to divulge:
  - a. It is possible that the person receiving ministry has never told anyone about what happened. Telling the story will often help by bringing the past situation into the light.
  - b. The deliverance minister does not need to know the details, but the person receiving ministry may need to tell their story as part of the healing process.
  - c. A woman may feel more comfortable telling another woman that story, but then when it is time to call the evil spirits out, a man can help do the deliverance prayers and not need to know all the gory details.
